This bachelor thesis criticizes current conception of economics and introduces new approach called complexity economics. It mainly concerns with unrealistic and reality deforming assumptions, static form of economics and efficient-market hypothesis. On the other side positively evaluates findings of behavioral economics and usage of modern computer-related computational methods. For this purpose it introduces new model of artificial stock market based on prospect theory and continuous double auction.