

This work attends to the Roman limes in Scotland, especially the Antonine Wall. Apart from the Wall itself, there is analysis of the whole Roman presence in Scotland, beginning with the forts and smaller military enclosures joined to the Wall, continuing with the whole network of roads and fortifications north and south of the Wall. In particular chapters is discussed the whole historical overtone of Roman presence in Scotland, the topography of each significant site, by which author means those ones, which are connected with the Antonine occupation of Scotland and the Roman limes in the region of nowadays Scotland. Apart from military sites, this work is concerned on one hand with the impact of Roman short-time presence on native population. On the other hand it includes study of history of the researches in the area of modern Scotland, or the relevance of studying the partial sources in the framework of the whole research of limes in Scotland. This work is also concerned with the builders of the Wall itself, same like the soldiers on the guarding duty on the Wall and their life in the harsh climate of the very north edge of the Roman Empire.
