

The aim of this work is to evaluate and compare the Czech Republic approach to developing countries. The evaluation is mainly based on Commitment to Development Index. Commitment to Development Index assesses 22 OECD DAC member countries on their overall approach to developing countries. It is published annually by the Center for Global Development. I computed and partly estimated the index for the Czech Republic and consequently compared and commented the results. The Czech Republic score is slightly below those of all EU member countries included in the index finally ending up at 20th place out of 23 countries. The Czech Republic scores well in environment and trade component and badly in trade. I also made some comments on the design of the index.
