

Abstract:

The thesis focuses on knowledge of the Czech language as a factor that can contribute to the integration of Russian migrants to the Czech society. The relation of language skills on the whole and its partial sites with the other aspects of integration process according to different dimensions of integration is analyzed on the basis of a questionnaire survey among the members of Russian community living in Prague. The theoretical part is aimed at acquainting a reader with the problems of immigrant integration and providing an overview for the theoretical foundations for the empirical part.
