This bachelor thesis deals with education in primary care, specifically the education which takes place in the offices of general practitioners for children and adolescents.

The theoretical part focuses on the history of pedagogy and education, the detailed description of the educational processes in primary care in pediatrics and educational issues related to this field.

In the empirical part, I used the methods of quantitative research. Goal of the research was to clarify the implementation of education in primary care in the offices of general practitioners for children and adolescents to determine whether the parents of children under 6 years (patients / clients of primary care) are provided with sufficient information regarding the care for their child and if that information is provided, who passes the information, whether the education takes place under appropriate conditions, through suitable mediums and whether the information is sufficient and for parents easy to understand. The research was also aimed at obtaining information on issues on which the health care professionals do educate or on the contrary do not educate, and also those about which the parents would prefer to be informed.

Keywords: educational process, the history of pedagogy and education, primary care, pediatrics, regular vaccinations, growth and child development, healthy lifestyles among children
