

Abstract

Thesis "Citizens' trust in health system CR" discusses the current state of czech health system, how is perceived by the citizens. In this thesis the focus is on the functioning of modern medicine. The theoretical part is devoted to the wider context of the problem of trust in the health care system. This section is trying to describe the changes in society which has been changing relationship of a doctor and patient. Most significant changes that affect this relationship are represented by the development of information society, as well as commercial and system pressure on the doctor. It also highlighted the importance there is the of human rights related to health and patient rights. The empirical part focuses on the research results and their discussion. The research method was applied in the form of qualitative interviews, which were then rewritten and clarified schematically using tables. Research results did not confirm the assumption that citizens lose trust in medicine as a science (lege artis). Problems of the health system respondents associate more with its wrong settings, which can be blamed for the Ministry of Health. Citizens were fairly unsatisfied with the current political situation and this is surely reflected the results of the decreased trust in state institutions.
