

Abstract

The objective of the paper is to analyse the changes in the reproductive behaviour of the population in the region of the Middle East and North Africa. The aim is to give reliable and comparable information about the population in the individual countries since the period of the World War II. to the present days. Based on the collected data this paper tries to specify the key trends of the reproductive changes. Pursued processes are related to the demographical, socio-cultural and economic context.