

The work deals with the analysis of internal migration of foreigners in the South Region. In this work is examined internal migration of three groups of foreigners. These groups are Ukrainians, Slovaks and Vietnamese. In the introductory part of this thesis is described the development of gradual migration of foreigners, their distribution and involvement in internal migration in the Czech Republic. This is followed by describing the South Region. This chapter describes the distribution of foreigners and are mentioned the possible factors that influence the decisions of foreigners. The main part of this thesis is a survey that examines the case of foreigners and their migration history. In this work, the region is defined by areas accessible to the community of České Budějovice and there are investigated differences inside and outside of the region. Thanks to questionnaire research we obtain information about the movement of foreigners as well as the motivation of these movements. Questionnaire survey also found out whether the migratory behavior of foreigners could be sorted into theoretical concepts
