

Two tombs M1 and M2 at the excavation sites in Suizhou and Baoshan are compared in order to reveal changes which have occurred during the Warring States period, with focus on the lacquer subjects. There are several ways of development according to historical-cultural introduction. Funeral lacquer objects share more common features than evolutionary differences, though there is a one-century gap between them. Both tombs keep the key informations.