

Abstract

The work deals with the appeal as the only proper legal remedy in the civil legal proceedings. After the general characterization of the appeal the work analyses the conditions of admissibility and inadmissibility of the appeal in the law given cases. The work proceeds to deal with the effects of the submitted appeal, the renouncement and the abandoning of the appeal. The attention is also paid to general and special requirements of the appeal and to the conditions under which new facts and proofs can be asserted.

The most comprehensive chapter has to do with the very appellate proceedings. There is a description of the work of the court of first instance and the one of appeal in the appellate proceedings, and furthermore quantitative and qualitative range of the appeal review. The explanation of the evidence process in the appellate proceedings, the duty of notice of the appellate court and the way of hearing an appeal is treated as well. In addition there is a special chapter that describes the way an appellate court reaches a decision.

The ending of the work is devoted to the costs of the appellate procedure and the author's recommendations de lege ferenda.
