

Abstract

The study deals with regional identity in Czech-Polish borderland. The Broumov region is an example of peripheral region which is suitable for research of forming of regional identity regarding its history (expulsion of Germans after World War II). This resettled region is compared with neighbouring regions without this historical experience (the Náchod region and Nové Město nad Metují region). The main aims are to analyze how inhabitants perceive his regional identity, how evaluate attractiveness of neighbouring towns and what take for regional symbols. The research is based on questionnaire inquiry.
