

Abstract

China is recognised as a key power in the contemporary, third geopolitical dividing of Africa. The goal of this thesis is to demonstrate that it is only in terms of trade, not assets which would then determine further, cultural links. A comprehensive index of economic dependence is introduced. It takes into account foreign direct investment, migrant remittances and official development assistance flowing into developing countries. For every African nation, their main economic partners will be determined.