This master's thesis is concerned with the immigration to rural areas in relation to the establishment of civil associations oriented to ecology and development activities. Through an analysis of three case studies it aims to study the question whether these associations might help the immigrants to integrate to the rural local environment as well as to form new social and organizational identities. The thesis summarises the results of the sociological research of rural areas, the studies of civil society, and also the modernist concepts of identity.