

An introduction to the theory of mixing of random processes is presented. The aim of this introduction is to be eventually able to separate general random processes, markov chains and markov chains with finite alphabet into groups which mix differently. The introduction is made complete by examples. We show, that for general processes those groups are separate, for markov chains some coincide, and for markov chains with finite alphabet all coincide.