

The content of this work is the description of the Bobox system, which is system for parallel data processing developed by the Department of Software Engineering of the Charles University, the analysis of its original scheduler and the design of a new, more efficient task scheduler and memory allocator of the system. The work also contains an experimental comparison of different approaches to the problematic.