This thesis describes design and implementation of a real-time strategy game Citadel. The emphasis is on application architecture, which uses Allegro library for graphics and controls and Boost Serialization library for saving the game. It also includes description of techniques used in implementation such as influence maps and a target system used by artificial intelligence, pathfinding algorithms, plasma fractal for map generation and a variant of Dinitz's algorithm for maximum flow.