

Abstract

Glutamate gated ion channels mediate the excitatory signal transduction in the central nervous system. They are essential in the processing of external stimuli, in the process of learning and during the formation of memory. Molecular mechanism of action single channels is not still fully understood. However increasing number of structural and electrophysiological data provides new details describing the mechanism for ion channel action.