

Abstract

This thesis closely deals with two heavily discussed aspects of contemporary society, that are very strongly inter-connected. The first aspect of society is the problem of right-wing radicalism and extremism in the Czech Republic, which manifests itself by xenophobic and hateful behavior, which then disrupts public order and therefore is related to the Police of the Czech Republic, whose job is to prevent the ruptures in order. This thesis deals with the development of extremism and the Police of the Czech Republic since 1989 and how the police reacts to this development by adequately improving its equipment, tactics, etc. The year 1989 has been set because it is the year when the political regime changed and new rules in society were established. The organizational structure of the police itself is discussed in detail, considering their interventions at events organized by right-wing radicals and extremists, which nowadays most often take the form of demonstrations and meetings.
