Case study: physiotherapy treatment of a patient with Bell’s palsy

The applied electrostimulation had always the same features in each therapy. Do you think, that was necessary to apply the electrostimulation to all facial muscles, even the patient was improving therapy to therapy? The student has demonstrated that he is able to work independently with the patient. His theoretical knowledge and practical experience are very good. Despite the comments stated above the work has logical structure, it meets the demands of the bachelor thesis.

Question: The applied electrostimulation had always the same features in each therapy. Do you thing, that was necessary to apply the electrostimulation to all facial muscles, even the patient was improving therapy to therapy? The student has demonstrated that he is able to work independently with the patient. His theoretical knowledge and practical experience are very good. Despite the comments stated above the work has logical structure, it meets the demands of the bachelor thesis.

Date: in Prague 20.5.2014

signature of the supervisor