The purpose of this research is to describe integration process of Czechs to British society in London. This research was based on Gordon’s steps of assimilation – cultural and structural assimilation and it shows us that integration process of migrants can come true although cultural assimilation didn’t happen. Being integrated in new society can be achieved by participation in institutional structures and by establishing social networks with host society. The argument of absence cultural assimilation has been supported also by expressions of transnationalism like transnational connections between host society and place of origin, what appears during participant observatory and making narrative interviews with immigrants.
