

ABSTRACT

The purpose of this thesis was to build a specialised corpus of Banatian Czech.

The theoretical section describes the historical and language situation in the Banat area focusing on its development since the 1990s to the present day. This is followed by a presentation and description of specialised corpora focusing on a corpus of spoken Czech.

Building a specialised corpus named BANAT is documented in detail (method of collection, processing and transcription of records, building of corpora and publishing).

The analysis of possessive pronouns, negative pronouns and adverbs and enclitics confirms a statistically significant difference between Banatian Czech and the present state of Czech language (in all observed phenomena except enclitics).
