

Abstract

This work in its first part lays out ways of classifying words into parts of speech, followed by criteria of these classifications. The second part covers the definition of adverbs, particles and conjunctions within Czech grammar. In the third part, the way grammar reflects overlap of the discussed parts of speech is analyzed. The interpretations of these issues in independent studies and monographs is also included. The last part of the work constitutes of individual research, which, based on carefully picked data, brings the overview of functions and properties of selected expressions. The aim of the work is to determine, by corpus analysis, which expressions belong to which part of speech and with which criteria the category of such can be determined.