

Abstract

Author mapped the development of German activist policy in the first Czechoslovak Republic. This direction of German policy wanted to achieve the goal of national settlement of the Sudeten German population by cooperation with Czechoslovak policy. The work focuses on the influence of German activist parties to the Czechoslovak political scene in 1918-1938. The central theme of the work is the period of the first participation of the German parties in the Czechoslovak government in 1926-1929. The author examines critical moments of action of the German activism in Czechoslovakia and the reasons that led to its end.

