

Abstract

This thesis focuses on the relationship between petition and judgment. Its first, mostly theoretical, chapter describes brief historical excursion to the evolution of the main concept of the civil procedure, the evolution of petition law. Second and third chapter are dealing with petition and judgment, their components, requirements, impacts, division etc. and their primal purpose is to familiarize the readers with this facts for better understanding of the relationship between petition and judgment. Finally, the fifth chapter of this thesis (most practical) constitutes the heart of my thesis and it is focused on the relationship between petition and judgment itself.
