

Bachelor thesis deals with ongoing revolution in Rojava and its ideological roots. Rojava is a region in northern Syria, occupied by mostly Kurdish population. Ongoing revolution has its ideological roots in the political philosophy of Abdullah Öcalan and Murray Bookchin. This thesis focuses on theoretical concepts of libertarian municipalism and democratic confederalism. These concepts are introduced in wider context of authors' political backgrounds and work. Then the revolution in Rojava is depicted, according to the current findings. The goal of the thesis is to compare the ideological roots of the revolution, and their actual implementation. Space is given as well to the critical reception of the revolution by the international left.
