

Abstract:

This bachelor's thesis describes the topic of foster care and its development in the newly defined law system. At the beginning it shows the importance of attachment, which is based on the basic needs of the child. It charted the development and types of attachment.

The other part focuses on the topic of pathology of attachment. It is briefly defined terms of deprivation and separation. The next section shows forms of treatment processes in cases of deprivation and separation. In cases of deprivation is a given treatment process in the form of adoption and long-term care. It includes a basic definition of these terms and changes resulting from the new modification of the legal definition of this issue.

In the section describing the healing process in case of separation is defined the foster care for a temporary period. Here it is pointed to process of attachment, interruption, or its transfer to another, new caregiver. It follows research proposal which can be the basis for subsequent studies. It is a comparison of the formation and sustain of emotional relationship in long-term foster care cases and in cases of foster care for a temporary period. There is an effort to highlight the complexity of the re-formation of attachment and its transferring to a new caregiver. In less ideal cases, the issue of re-breaking of this bond.

Keywords:

Adoption, foster care, temporary foster care, deprivation, separation, attachment