This thesis deals with the psychological phenomena that are associated with the pharmacological pain management in a context of palliative care. The theoretical part of this thesis deals with pain and pharmacological pain management from a psychological point of view and emphasizes the role of the psychologist in this process. This thesis is based on the latest scientific findings by Czech and international researchers and focuses on the factors that affect the attitude toward opioids of doctors, patients and caregivers. This thesis also includes a research plan, which inquire the relationship between the quality of communication and attitude toward opioids of caregivers in the mobile palliative care.