

Through analysis of various source materials (archival documents, personal memories and regional literature) this master's thesis focuses on reconstructing the process of the expulsion of Germans from the former Horšovský Týn region carried out within 1945–1948, which is defined as both organized and unorganized as well as spontaneous and enforced one, including the preparation phase of the process organized by the State Administration, and particularly the period of the Czech aggression against German population, and also the so-called period of additional transportation.
