

ABSTRACT

This thesis presents data gained from qualitative research that took place in Czech Republic from February to June in 2015. Based on semi-structured interview with pregnant women analyses pregnancy experience and understanding of their own physicality. In the theoretical part of this thesis I highlight the approaches of hegemonic discourses of pregnancy and alternative structures in feminist debates. In the next part I focus on poststructuralism. The empirical part of this thesis focuses on two main parts. First, I present physicality of pregnant women and than construction pregnant women as human beings.
