

This thesis is devoted to the area of sentiment analysis. Its goal is to discuss and compare various methods applicable to sentiment classification of short texts. When analyzing the described techniques, we will orient ourselves towards the context of social networks. Recently, this type of media became the source of vast amounts of data and the demand for its automatic processing is high. Interesting results have been obtained for clustering used in combination with supervised learning and convolution, which is primarily used for image data.