

The root system architecture adjustment is one of the possible plant reactions to stress effects of environmental conditions. The shape of root system is jointly formed by the root apical meristem activity, the rate of elongation of root cells and by the degree of formation, development and organization of secondary and adventitious roots. This paper aims to describe basic mechanisms of the root system development and outline the morphological and regulatory changes occurring during development while being affected by selected stress factors.