

Pharmacotherapy, Educational Therapy, Cognitive-Behavior Therapy, and other training methods are mentioned most frequently as optimum methods of comprehensive treatment of psychotic patients. In my thesis, I attempt to increase awareness of possible therapy options, and include another approach which has been applied in psychotherapy for many decades, which has been tested by research for its efficiency, but which is also met with scepticism whenever its application in psychotherapy of psychotic disorders is mentioned. In this theoretical account I present assets and limitations of Person Centered Therapy, and prepare grounds for future empirical research which would validate statements proposed in the present study.