

Abstract

Bachelor thesis focuses on topic of "traditional" families and its function in 21st century in concept of family politics. Thesis tries to remind traditional families, which are not typical nowadays, however they still do exist. The aim of the thesis is to determine the stance of traditional family in scope of family politics in Czech Republic and tries to identify its possible problematic areas. The answers are sought through the connection of theoretical parts that include division of families, women and gender and also family politics in Czech Republic in relation to traditional families and, last but not least, with the help of qualitative thematic analysis of conducted conversations. The thesis proves that family politics in Czech Republic is not inclined to those families, on the other hand, families themselves does not find a problem there and are fully reconciled with it. It also defines three main problematic areas concerning disrespect in society role, financial difficulties and rising of children itself. Positive finding is that the problematic areas are not in the way of traditional families that would force them to choose for another family model.
