

Abstract

The bachelor thesis deals with the issue of human sexuality and sexual identity, with an emphasis on the current issue of the new categorization of the term polyamory in the Czech society. The theoretical part of the thesis discusses besides the plasticity of human sexuality and individual socio-cultural constructions, from which the formal multi-partnerships could begin to form and their clear delineation as opposed to other non-monogamous clusters. The second part of the text is the result of field research focusing on the life of Czech polyamorics. Due to the controversy of non-monogamous coexistence, the present and the future of polyamorphic relations are discussed in almost exclusively monogamous Czech society. Part of the practical investigation is also a partial mapping of the views of this majority society.
