Abstract

The Bachelor's thesis aims to provide a comprehensive overview of the North Korean refugees' settlement and integration in South Korea. The first part of the thesis offers a brief introduction to the subject and explores contemporary trends and patterns in the North Korean migration. I then discuss the South Korean government's attitudes towards the refugee issue and the development of policies aimed at supporting North Korean refugees. The thesis continues with a detailed description of the support program and benefits available to the refugees. Finally, the last chapter of the thesis highlights the barriers posed to the adaptation of North Koreans settled in the Republic of Korea.
