

Abstract

This thesis analyses the ancient Greek lexica concerning the unique characteristics of the Attic dialects and the Atticist lexica. The two most important – The Ecloga of Phrynichus and the so called Antiatticist – are put through the analysis of the differences or similarities they have, how they work with the lexical material, how they define the Standard Attic language, what canonical text they operate with and how would the authors have reacted to each other. The other Attic and Atticist lexica are described by quotes with translations. The thesis also summarizes the present status of research in Greek lexicography.
