Coordination of social security system is very important for migrant workers who, during their careers working in more countries around the world. This creates entitlements to the payment of social benefits in countries where they have gainful employment, but are often affected by sufficient insurance periods, which may not, however, be fulfilled in that country. For this reason, countries enter into agreements among themselves in order to facilitate migrant workers access to social security benefits to be entitled. Adjustment between states exists both at the multilateral level and at bilateral level. This laws shows how the coordination of social security system regulated at the multilateral level, especially within the European Union but also at the bilateral level the example of treaties that Czech Republic has concluded with other world countries, also focuses on the introduction of institutions that coordinate social security system fulfill in Czech Republic.

At the multilateral level, the most important adjustment is created at the level of the European Union. This is based on the right to free movement, which is one of the fundamental principles on which the European Union is built. Coordination of the social security system in the European Union itself has four basic principles: equality of treatment, the application of the rule of law of a single state, aggregation of insurance periods and maintaining acquired rights. I find that equality of treatment is a universal principle, which also applies to other adjustment for the coordination of the social security system. It is regulated both at multilateral level and at bilateral level.

Coordination of the social security system is a system that is constantly evolving. In connection with the referendum on United Kingdom membership of the European Union, have proven to be any changes to the coordination of social security system in the European Union, which is the most adapted system of coordination of social security systems. These changes are likely to be reflected in the coordination of social security systems in other regional systems, which together with the bilateral arrangements are the most important for coordination.
