

Abstract

This bachelor thesis deals with the possible breakout points for women who have become victims of domestic violence. It surveys the possibilities of institutional care for these women and then submits this care to their criticism. With the help of domestic violence victims, the author tries to detect outages in the care system and explains the possible way out of this problem. In the theoretical part of the bachelor thesis, the reader familiarizes himself with the typology of domestic violence and with the basic theories in the context of which the victims of the harassment are being seen. The very merit of this work is the deep semi-structured interviews through which the author seeks after the outages of institutional care. Closer are described in the practical part. When thoroughly analysing the data obtained, the most frequent problems are encountered, not in the wording of the documents themselves, but in the meetings of workers professionally called liner officers.
