

Abstract

This thesis deals with the topic of stability, more precisely instability of marriage. It defines the concept of marriage and the concepts of stability and instability by defining the terms of satisfaction in marriage, the quality of marriage, and the susceptibility to divorce. It also describes the evolution of the marital relationship and its stability over time. It outlines the current situation characterized by a trend of unmarried cohabitation and a relatively high divorce rate. In the main section, it describes selected factors that contribute to the destabilization of the marital relationship.

In the part devoted to the suggestion of a possible research, a design of a mapping study is presented, which would describe the current situation in the Czech Republic and which could also be used for other research projects as a default position.
