

Abstract:

This thesis deals with a subject of relationship between the usage of social site Facebook and the level of satisfaction in relationships with friends and acquaintances among adolescents. The main survey question deals with a relationship between total time spent on Facebook and friendship satisfaction. The first partial question compares in detail the differences between the time spent on specific activities on Facebook and its relation to friendship satisfaction among adolescents. The second partial question divides Facebook activities to active and pasive and compares total times spent on each activities with measure of friendship satisfaction.

Summary of literature is dealing with specifics of communication on the internet, importance of relationships in persons life and finally descripes social site Facebook and ways of using Facebook.

At the end there is a proposal of quantative research, where two questionnaires should be used. The first qestionnaire measures the time spent on Facebook and is originally created by author and based on previous researches. The second questionnaire, measures the satiscaftion in field of friendship and it is taken from Qestionnaire of life satisfaction. Specifically the scale of: Friends and relatives is taken from the QLS. Results from both questionnaires would be colerated and existence or non existence of connection would be watched. The assumption is, that Facebook is strenghtening present friendship relationships and helps to maintain them, if it is used mostly to communicate with already existing friends.
