

Abstract

This thesis will focus on the International Women's Day celebration - a holiday whose present perception is strongly influenced by distinct ideology before 1989. The thesis will reflect its perception by the views of three generations of one family. The main part of the work will focus on the analysis of collective memory and family recollection of a particular event in a specific family due to generational differences.