

The topic and the title of this master thesis is Organization of public administration and its main objective is to provide comprehensive view on organisation of public administration in Czech Republic with closer focus on government administration and territorial self-government. The main sources used for this thesis were literature, legal regulations and case-law. The thesis is divided into four logically arranged chapters. First chapter is dedicated to theoretical overview of public administration, its organization and main principles. Second chapter is called Government Administration and is mainly focused on system of its direct executors, which consists of government, ministries, as well as central administrative agencies and other administrative agencies with national geographical coverage. This chapter also deals with indirect executors of government such as municipalities and regional authorities. Main objective of this chapter is to provide overview of these mentioned executors, their scope and relative legislation. Following chapter is devoted to territorial self-government, executed by territorial self-governing units, which is guaranteed by Constitution of Czech Republic and the state can intervene only if it is necessary for the protection of the law. This chapter is divided into three sub-chapters – Community, Region and Capital City of Prague. Last and final chapter of this thesis is dedicated to interest self-government and is divided into three subchapters. The aim of this thesis is to give an integrated view on the subject and to deal with the problematic parts