

Abstract

This bachelor's thesis focuses on problems related to the departure of young adults from children's homes. It describes problems that these people face when leaving such institutions. The thesis also describes subjects that are in relationships with clients during the time of their departure and therefore can inform them about opportunities for help and support. The aim of the methodological part is to discover how the young adults that leave children's homes are informed about opportunities for help and support. This part shows who informs young adults about organizations and services which often are their only source of help.
