The thesis is an analysis of practical methods of work of foster parents with children with attachment disorders. I analyse what methods foster parents use to process the trauma of a neglected child who did not form a basic emotional bond with the caregiver at the beginning of life. I deal with the system of care for endangered children in the Czech Republic, the issue of substitute family care, the theory of attachment, attachment disorders and various therapeutic schools that process these disorders. The theoretical background is then supported by evidence obtained from interviews with selected foster parents.
