

This thesis investigates basic properties of the interpoint distances between random vectors drawn from multinomial distribution. We also describe a possible application to testing sparse observations, i.e., a setup with small number of observations and large number of categories, where the classical χ^2 -test cannot be recommended. As an alternative, utilizing the multinomial interpoint distances, we will present the test statistic proposed by Biswas and Ghosh (2014).