

This rigorous thesis deals with the issue of political and diplomatical relationship between Czechoslovakia and Italy during 3 years from the March on Rome in 1922, by which Mussolini's National Fascist Party came to power in Italy until the Locarno Conference in 1925. The aim is to analyse the factors influencing relations between these two countries in the respective period. My work does not focus on bilateral associations solely, relations between the two countries are to be scrutinized within the frame of broader contingencies of the development in Europe in the twenties of the 20th century, primarily under the angle of the active politics of both countries Czechoslovakia and Italy in the Central-European space. I have been looking for common and contradictive phenomenons of both nations on the background of the European events of that time.
