

Abstract

The aim of the thesis is to use the methodology of oral history to collect and analyze the statements of five respondents from the Libyan environment, or respondents who have a material relationship to the Libyan issue. The focus is on personal experiences of the 2011 civil war and views and attitudes towards the war and Libya in general. The statements are directed both to the experience of war reality and to the broader context of war. The narrators were asked about their attitudes towards the regime of Muammar Gaddafi and about the development of their views on his personality. Research also tries to capture Libyan everyday life before and after the war. The purpose of this work is to provide an insight into the lives of people in this country ravaged by conflict and to try to capture the reality of war as they perceived it. What lives did these people lead before the war? How did they take part in the war? What are their views and beliefs and how did these views and attitudes evolve? The work also contains a historical overview of events, written on the basis of available Czech and foreign literature.
