

Based on media theories, marketing and sociology studies, this master's thesis aims to prove that Public Relations affect the press and the same influences might be revealed in a variety of media addressing different target groups. The theoretical part focuses on some of the theories of media effects and the broad issue of PR which is placed into a broader marketing context. The practical part of the thesis is based on analysing PR influences in press releases and women lifestyle magazines.