

Abstract

This bachelor thesis deals with the transformations of Czech agriculture during the last century and especially after 1990. The whole period is accompanied by major social changes that have affected the whole landscape and people. It is the end of the Great War, the communist putsch, the collectivization and the restitution processes that shaped our country and built agriculture here. Due to political and natural forces, Czech agriculture has changed the landscape, and this work aims to assess selected influences. As part of the analysis, the Tábor area, which represents a traditional agricultural region, will be evaluated. The model area will be introduced in more detail and placed in the context of these changes and agriculture in our country.
