

This doctoral thesis focuses on examining the concept of a subject self-representation in a historical perspective, using the Servite order as an example. It aims to provide an elaborated text offering a variety of empirical materials as well as interpretations that might contribute to the more intensive debate on the self-representation strategies of a religious order in the Habsburg monarchy during early modern period.